Most famous explorers, if not almost all of them in modern history, were men, but here and there we hear about a woman who travelled to faraway places as well.

Sacagawea was one of them. She was the daughter of a Native American and she was born in 1788 in what is now known as Idaho, in the United States of America. She lived with her husband near the Missouri River. In November 1804, Meriwether Lewis, William Clark and their men arrived in the area. They were looking for a way to cross to the Pacific Ocean. The group of explorers decided to spend the winter in the area. At the end of the winter, in February 1805, Sacagawea went with them on their journey because she could speak both English and a Native American language.

Sacagawea travelled with the men even though she had a very young baby boy, Jean Baptiste, with her. She was very useful to the explorers during the journey. She knew which plants and herbs people could eat and where to find them, and one time, when they were on a boat and it started to sink, she helped save the things on the boat.

The group of explorers reached the Pacific coast in November 1805. Sacagawea, her husband and her baby son stayed with the explorers at Fort Clatsop until March the following year. They came back with the explorers on their return journey as far as the Mandan villages.

We don't know very much about the rest of the life of this brave woman explorer, but we know that she had a second child, a baby girl called Lisette. Sacagawea probably died in Fort Manuel in 1812.

- Few women in history became famous explorers.  T
- Sacagawea's husband was Native American.
- The explorers set off on their travels at the end of the winter.
- Sacagawea could speak more than one language.
- The explorers only travelled by boat.
- There isn't much information about Sacagawea's life.

People communicate by using languages and gestures and by reading another person's facial expressions and emotions. (1) c. Even some insects, like bees, use different kinds of dancing to exchange information about flowers, pollen and nectar. But what about birds? (2) _____

We all know about birds such as parrots which can repeat words and sentences that people have taught them. (3) _____ Well, at least one of them seems to do so! Einstein, the African grey parrot, knows more than 200 words and she can use more than 85 when her trainer asks her to.

(4) _____ He lived with his owner, Irene Pepperberg, who was also his teacher. She taught him to communicate with humans using English! Alex died when he was 31 years old.

(5) _____ Finally, are there any animals which can communicate with humans using sign language? Washoe, the chimp, and Koko, the gorilla, are two animals that have learnt to use the American sign language system to 'talk' to humans. But Koko doesn't just communicate with humans. (6) _____ Two little cats!

- a Do our feathered friends 'talk'?
- b His last words to Irene were, 'You be good. See you tomorrow. I love you.'
- c We also know that many mammals, like dogs and dolphins, for example, also use some kind of language to communicate
- d She has even got her own pets!
- e Before Einstein, there was another very clever talking bird, Alex the parrot.
- f But do they understand what they say?
